THE ORIGINS OF HOMEOPATHY

Homeopathy means ‘same-suffering’ and is a system of medicine named 200 years ago by a German medical doctor who was tired of seeing the side-effects of substances ingested as medicines.

The substance that started his inquiry into the bad effects of concentrated substances on the human condition was Quinine. It was used for Malaria and could help back to Chinchona Bark from the Rubiaceae family of plants (the same family as coffee) that was and is still used to make quinine. As he began chewing it, he realized – as if the poison that can cure you of the problem, can also create the problem. So, he realized why using it would help – yet in large doses it poisoned. By creating a release of kinetic energy or resonance, this doctor was able to rediscover the fundamental laws of nature, one being that if something can kill you, chances are the same cyanide in bamboo is what keeps the Panda alive and well. But it is not taken in concentrated doses, or in isolated doses, it is taken in the dose the Earth has given us as wild creatures.

As civilized creatures, it is through dilution and specifically, through the homeopathic process of making our remedies, that we go back to being healthy. It is through the Earth’s processing of substances as our only guide. Homeopathy touches on a part of this process that reminds us to be careful of the chemical pure form of a substance, even if it has the chemical form in it. Tea is a diluted form which is naturopathic, while, a homeopathic medicine is like a snowflake that has captured the code and when it is diluted, it still has the chemical form in it.
